System Requirements: * Windows XP or higher. *.NET Framework 4.0 or higher. * Visual Studio 2010. * Visual Studio 2012. Customization: * TargetFramework * [TextLocalizer](virulence of H5N1 avian influenza A viruses from Korean flocks experiencing two successive outbreaks. Outbreaks of avian influenza H5N1 were reported in Korea in February 2010. The H5N1

outbreaks occurred in live poultry markets (LPM) and this is considered the most plausible route of transmission to humans. Of 3,012 birds tested from LPMs in Korea, 20% were positive for H5N1. To understand the molecular basis of host range of H5N1 virus, virulence of H5N1 viruses isolated from the two outbreaks was investigated. H5N1 isolates from LPM-2008 and -2010 are categorized into the same group as H5N1 viruses isolated from wild birds. Genome analyses of eight H5N1 isolates from LPM-2008 and -2010 revealed that the eight isolates (K24/K27, K45/K46, K54, K55, K56, K57, K66, and K68) shared highly homologous sequences and possessed some virulence-associated markers, including a PB2-627K/E, PB1-F2V/A, HA-K193R, NS-L31V, and PA-L23I. Interestingly, the isolates from LPM-2010 had the same deduced amino acid substitutions of the seven virulence-associated markers as in the isolates from LPM-2008. In order to understand the virulence of H5N1 viruses isolated from the two outbreaks, we constructed a reassortant virus, containing six gene
